Affordable housing urged at old RCMP HQ

Fairmont Complex.
NDP MP wants to try to ease accommodation 'crisis' in city by converting federally owned land

New Democrat MP Don Davies is lobbying Ottawa to make affordable housing and park space a priority on a prime piece of unused, federally owned real estate in Vancouver.

Davies, who represents Vancouver Kingsway, told reporters Thursday that he recently learned the federal government has plans to sell the 8.5-hectare parcel of land, which once housed the headquarters for the RCMP's "E" Division, to the Canada Lands Company, a Crown corporation, for redevelopment.

Known as the Fairmont Complex, the property, located on Heather Street between 33rd Avenue and 37th Avenue, takes up four city blocks just off Cambie Street.

With its desirable location, Davies said developers will likely scramble for the property, estimated to be worth at least $300 million. But he wants the federal government to set aside commercial interests and provide affordable housing on the property.

"We have an affordable housing crisis," he said. "Trying to find affordable accommodation in Vancouver is becoming almost impossible."

Davies said he hears from constituents on a daily basis who tell him they can't find an affordable place to live in the city.

"If we can't create affordable housing on publicly owned land, where is it supposed to be created?" he asked.

Park space also needs to be a set aside for the property's future, Davies said.

A century-old Tudor-style building, known as the Fairmont Training Academy, has also sat mostly vacant on the property since the RCMP moved out last year to the detachment's new Greens Timbers headquarters in Surrey.

With that building recognized as a federal heritage site, Davies also called on Ottawa to ensure the building's architectural history is preserved in its redevelopment. He proposed the building be used as an artists' space or a daycare centre.

Before the property is sold, Davies said Ottawa needs to hold meaningful community consultation with provincial and municipal governments, as well as neighbourhood residents and First Nations stakeholders.

At least 17 First Nations groups have officially laid claim to the land, he said.

"So it is quite clear that any disposal or dealing with this land must have meaningful engagement of First Nations at all stages of this process," he said.

A Public Works spokesman said the ministry could not comment on the property's future at this time.

Trans Mountain requests NEB's help in Burnaby

Pipeline feud.
Company asks energy board to 'forbid' city staff from blocking survey crews

The company trying to build a pipeline through Burnaby Mountain wants the National Energy Board's help to get past city crews who refuse to allow it to survey the land in the first place.

Trans Mountain filed a motion with the National Energy Board Wednesday asking the regulator to "forbid" the City of Burnaby from blocking access to its land in order for it to conduct survey work.

The company, which was set up by Kinder Morgan to build the pipeline, needs to bore a hole in the conservation area to determine whether it's even possible to build a two-kilometre stretch of pipeline through the mountain.

It argues that "superficial access" to the land will not give the NEB enough information to make an informed decision about the fate of the proposed pipeline, which would ship bitumen from Alberta and dramatically increase tanker traffic in the Burrard Inlet.

But Burnaby Mayor Derek Corrigan argues that while Trans Mountain can legally access the land, it cannot break bylaws such as cutting down trees. He invited the company to take the city to court to determine whether the bylaws or the NEB hold more sway.

Trans Mountain crews have cut down seven red alder trees thus far, according to a statement from the company.

That action prompted the city to issue a stop-work order to the company Tuesday.

When Trans Mountain crews showed up again Wednesday, they had a standoff with city workers, who blocked the pipeline contractors from the property until they eventually left.

It's not clear what the National Energy Board will do with Trans Mountain's request. The NEB did not respond to Metro's request for comment by deadline.

Northern Gateway. Project not likely to start in 2018

The president of the Northern Gateway pipeline says it's unlikely the project will start up in 2018 as the company seeks to win over B.C. First Nations groups, many of which remain adamantly opposed to the $7.9-billion project.

"We have stated that the earliest in-service date was 2018. That's quickly evaporating because we need to have this time to meet with people," John Carruthers told a Calgary business audience on Thursday.

"I'm not as fussed on what that date is. I'm more fussed on can we have the support we need to go ahead, so it's positive for all people of Canada, including aboriginal people?

"That's going to take time and it's going to take the time it takes."

So far, 26 First Nations groups along the route have signed agreements with Enbridge to take a share of a 10 per cent equity stake in the pipeline that the company had offered. Enbridge is now in talks with other groups about other ways to participate in the project, such as employment and procurement contracts.

"There's a lot of dialogue with both equity owners and non-equity at this point," Carruthers told reporters.

But many First Nations along the route are vehemently opposed to the pipeline and have said they wouldn't accept it under any circumstances. Lawsuits could tie the project up in court for years.

If built, Northern Gateway would ship 525,000 barrels per day of diluted oilsands crude from the Edmonton area to Kitimat, B.C., where the oil would be loaded on tankers and shipped to Asia.

OSGEMEOS. World-famous Brazilian artist duo transform Granville Island silos into colourful work of public art

emily.jackson@metronews.ca

Six concrete silos on Granville Island that didn't warrant a second glance a month ago are now attracting attention from around the world.

Using 1,400 cans of spray paint, the internationally renowned Brazilian twin-brother artists OSGEMEOS have transformed the grey infrastructure into six colourful giants. The mural is the artists' largest project ever and is being completed as part of the Vancouver Biennale public art exhibition.

"We are getting worldwide attention that is great for our city. It's great for our economy; it's great for cultural tourism," Biennale spokeswoman Miriam Blume said Thursday.

Vogue Brazil and the L.A. Times travel section have published articles about the mural — a win for Vancouver's tourism industry, Blume said.

"It's great for people to know something about Vancouver more than our ski slopes and the ocean — it's something we can brag about," she said, adding the False Creek Ferries have seen a boost in business from tourists who want to see the back side of the mural.

It's the first time Biennale, a non-profit organization best known for bringing the laughing statues to English Bay, has used crowdfunding to fund a project.

So far, it has earned more than $54,000 on its Indiegogo campaign for the project but it needs to raise $125,000 to cover the costs. About 50 per cent of the donations come from outside Canada, Blume said. The first major donor was a couple from Texas.

"We've gotten $1 up to $15,000. All of this tells us people are really embracing this particular project as well as public art and the importance of public art in our city," she said. "But public art doesn't come for free."

Blume encourages local philanthropists to donate to the project, which can be enjoyed by anyone without a lineup or a ticket. Love it or hate it — one Yaletown resident who complained about the project ended up donating $1,000 after seeing the art progress — public art is about starting a conversation, Blume said.

Vancouverites are invited to the Ocean Concrete site on Sunday for a free celebration of the mural. The artists will be on-site, and the Biennale plans to take an aerial photo of the crowd. Festivities run from noon to 5 p.m.

Experts say teachers' strike a matter of which side will 'outlast' the other

British Columbia's teachers' strike is sailing into uncharted waters, with no resolution on the horizon for the turbulent dispute that has delayed the start of the school year for the first time in provincial history.

Labour experts are advising families to prepare for at least a couple of weeks without school as the union and the provincial government butt heads in the media, with no plans to get back to bargaining.

"It's a matter of who's going to outlast the other," said industrial-relations professor Tom Knight with the University of British Columbia.

"Because it's such a public issue, you've got all sorts of spin happening. Both parties are vying for public support and so are characterizing the other party as the villain and themselves as doing the right and just thing."

On Thursday, Education Minister Peter Fassbender confirmed the government had lifted a lockout notice and urged the union for a third time to suspend its walkout so the parties could attempt to negotiate a settlement.

The B.C. Teachers' Federation told its picketing members in a memo that a news conference by Premier Christy Clark a day prior was "inflammatory and error-ridden" and vowed to carry on striking.

The stalemate means 40,000 teachers aren't getting paid while the province's half-a-million public-school children are missing lessons.

Green spaces may lead to healthier babies: UBC study

'A surprise.'
Researchers focused on 64,000 births in Metro Vancouver hospitals from 1999 to 2004

THANDI FLETCHER
thandi.fletcher@metronews.ca

Mothers who live in neighbourhoods with plenty of grass and trees are more likely to deliver babies at full term with higher birth weights, according to the latest study from the University of B.C.

Researchers looking at data from 64,000 births in Metro Vancouver hospitals from 1999 to 2004 found that severe pre-term births were 20 per cent lower and moderate pre-term births were 13 per cent lower for mothers who lived in greener neighbourhoods.

Babies from neighbourhoods with more green space also weighed an average of 45 grams more at birth than those from less green areas, researchers found.

"It was a surprise," said Dr. Michael Brauer, a professor in UBC's School of Population and Public Health and the study's senior author. "We don't actually think of trees as something that can make you healthier."

The study's findings held up when researchers adjusted for other factors like neighbourhood income, exposure to air pollution, noise and walkability.

Brauer said researchers aren't entirely sure why greenery affects the birth weight of infants and the likelihood of women to deliver their babies full-term.

However, he said the study underscores the need for governments to look at increasing green spaces as a cost-effective strategy to prevent disease.

Katie Grant, a Vancouver mother of two, said she often spends time in her neighbourhood's parks and that both her children were born full-term and at a healthy weight.

Green spaces have continued to play an important role in her children's development, she said.

"Kids get exercise and get to socialize with other kids," she said. "It's a chance to get out of the house and get some fresh air."

Mayor aims for Broadway subway

Mayor Gregor Robertson's top priority if re-elected in November will be to turn the dream of a Broadway subway into reality.

The mayor and members of his Vision Vancouver team kicked off the fall campaign season at VCC-Clark Station Thursday by repeating their strong support for an underground extension of the Millennium line west to UBC. (Yes, they arrived at the news conference by SkyTrain.)

"The Broadway subway is the single most important decision Vancouver can make, an initiative to support the environment and the economy of our city," Robertson told reporters, noting the subway would take 50,000 cars off the road and have an estimated 250,000 riders on its first day of operations.

Construction wouldn't begin until at least 2020 — two years after the next four-year civic politician term is over.

According to a 10-year plan by the mayors' council, which Robertson strongly endorsed, investments in rapid transit along the Broadway corridor to Arbutus, not UBC, would begin in Year 6 of the plan.

And that's if the $7.5-billion plan gets funding. To achieve that, leaders need to convince citizens to vote for some sort of additional tax in a referendum scheduled for 2015. On that schedule, construction on the Broadway subway would break ground in 2021 at the earliest.

But Robertson said it's crucial to put all possible support behind the Broadway subway to ensure the project attracts cash from higher levels of government. EMILY JACKSON/METRO

NATO urged to tackle ISIS threat

Summit. Britain and the U.S. are counting on the alliance to step up against the al-Qaida splinter group wreaking havoc in the Middle East

A meeting of NATO leaders convened in Britain Thursday facing no shortage of crises and a challenge from two of its dominant partners to confront a virulent new form of Islamic extremism in the Middle East.

Both U.S. President Barack Obama and British Prime Minister David Cameron called on the 28-member military alliance to deal with the emerging threat posed by the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS), an al-Qaida splinter group.

"We meet here at a solemn moment for our alliance and the security of our nations," Cameron said at the opening of the summit, being held on a rolling golf resort in the seaside Welsh community of Newport.

"We meet at a crucial time in the history of our alliance. The world faces many dangerous and evolving threats and it is absolutely clear that NATO is as vital to our future as it has been in our past."

Even the brush-fire war in eastern Ukraine and a resurgent Russia seemed to be eclipsed by the growing concern over ISIS, whose ranks of hardened fighters have been bolstered by hundreds of westerners from Britain, Canada and the United States.

The urgency is propelled by horrific Internet images of beheaded journalists and reports of atrocities in Syria and northern Iraq, as well as the fear that foreign fighters could return home to continue their war in the West.

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry convened a meeting of possible coalition partners, who could participate in an expanded bombing campaign and humanitarian relief.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who is also attending the summit, made it clear Wednesday, speaking to a British business audience, that Canada is prepared to do more as part of the international effort.

The Canadian air force is currently using two cargo planes to fly arms and ammunition into Iraq.

Sides aim for truce in Ukraine

Ukraine's government and rebels voiced hope Thursday that they were within reach of a peace deal that could spell a quick end to bloodshed in eastern Ukraine, even as NATO leaders and Ukraine's president agreed that Russia should be punished for its role in the insurgency.

Ukrainian President Petro Poroshenko said he was ready to order a ceasefire in eastern Ukraine if a deal is signed at scheduled talks Friday in Minsk, Belarus. The rebels said they were ready to declare a truce if an agreement can be reached on a political settlement for the mostly Russian-speaking region.

Before flying to Wales for his meetings Thursday with NATO leaders, Poroshenko discussed the outlines of a peace deal with Russian President Vladimir Putin, and both voiced optimism about reaching agreement.

Specifics of the hoped-for peace deal have yet to be finalized. Putin has suggested that rebels halt their offensive while the Ukrainian government forces should pull back away from shelling residential areas.

By the numbers

The battles have taken a heavy toll on Ukraine's army. National Security Council spokesman Col. Andriy Lysenko said 837 Ukrainian servicemen have been killed and 3,044 wounded since the fighting began.

Poroshenko, in turn, has called for the withdrawal of foreign troops, a diplomatic reference to Russian forces, as well as establishing a buffer zone on the border and releasing all Ukrainian prisoners held in Russia.

Since mid-April, Moscow-backed separatists have been fighting government troops in eastern Ukraine in a conflict the UN estimates has killed nearly 2,600 people. On Thursday, a NATO military officer told The Associated Press the ranks of Russian soldiers directly involved in the conflict have grown.

Kremlin officials repeatedly have denied their troops or military assets are involved.

Iraq. Kurds tell Baird they need heavy weapons

Canada and allies France, Italy, Britain and Australia are, at the request of the Iraqis and Americans, helping to airlift guns, mortars and ammunition to Iraqi forces and the Kurdish Peshmerga, who have shouldered the bulk of the ground fighting against the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS).

Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird visited a front-line Peshmerga post in Irbil, Iraq, on Thursday, with NDP and Liberal parliamentary critics Paul Dewar and Marc Garneau.

A senior Kurdish official made an urgent plea Thursday for heavy weaponry to fight the rampaging terrorist insurgency.

"We need more weapons.... It will be a long fight," said Faud Hussein, chief of staff to the president of the Kurdish Regional government.

But Baird politely deflected all talk of bolstering arms shipments to the Kurds, choosing instead to change the channel to his stated purpose for this trip — to encourage the development of a strong, new, inclusive central government in Baghdad. THE CANADIAN PRESS

Chemical stock

U.S. fears Syrian weapons will end up in wrong hands

The United States is concerned that the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS) and other terrorists could get a hold of chemical weapons if Syria is hiding any stockpiles, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations said Thursday.

Samantha Power spoke to reporters after the Security Council received a briefing from Sigrid Kaag, who heads the effort to rid Syria of its chemical weapons.

The joint mission of the UN and the Organization for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons will end at the end of the month after destroying nearly all of Syria's declared stockpile. But Kaag said there are discrepancies in Syria's weapons declaration. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Tomorrow's leaders look ahead to the New Canada

Charlottetown.
A selected few come together to discuss crucial areas in Canada's development over the next five decades

STEPHANIE ORFORD
For Metro

What will Canada become in the next 50 years? The New Canada Conference, held from Aug. 31 to Sept. 3, brought together delegates aged 19 to 24 from across Canada to answer that question.

One hundred delegates from across the country were chosen to attend the conference in Charlottetown, as part of P.E.I. 2014.

During the event, delegates broke into eight concentrations, each discussing a critical area in Canada's development over the next 50 years. At the end of the conference they gathered again and presented their ideas — all summarized in a conference Ideabook.

"My eyes were opened to so many things I never thought of," said Caitlin Taylor, a travel blogger with Saskatchewanderer, who collaborated as part of the Media and Technology group. "I learned so much and I want to share that."

Joseph Darcel, a sciences student at the University of Manitoba who worked in the Health and Wellness stream, called his peers at the conference "a very accomplished group."

"(The conference) was a chance for me to interface with people who didn't share my background," said Darcel. "It provided a helpful and informative way to engage in that dialogue and learn about different ways of being Canadian."

Civic Engagement and Social Cohesion Facilitator: Dave Meslind

How can we create a culture of participation in Canada?

"In order for democracy to work properly, we need to focus on enhancing social cohesion, focusing on social determinants of health and community engagement," said Olivia Dorey, a Nova Scotian studying public health and administration at the University of Ottawa who participated in the Civic Engagement and Social Cohesion discussion group.

Delegates discussed solutions like alternative voting systems and democracy in schools.

The goal? "Build a society in which our democracy can flourish," Dorey said.

Health and Well-being Facilitator: Ryan Meili

Factors such as income, education, housing and nutrition have been found to be the strongest determinants of the health and well-being of the Canadian population — so how can Canada develop a system to address these?

Delegates focused on how to target the causes of poor health and well-being, discussing issues such as "how Canada can work with aboriginal peoples to move into the future equitably," according to Darcel.

Delegates take part in the New Canada Conference in Charlottetown this week. COURTESY DAVID PIKE

Learning and Social Development Facilitator: Paul Kershaw

The group focused on ideas to strengthen the learning and social development of Canada's children.

"For me, our group's across-the-board recognition of the need for culturally aware, accessible and inclusive social services was most impactful," said Trent Warner, a public relations student at Mount Royal University in Calgary who participated in the Learning and Social Development group.

"We were all able to recognize the intersectional links between those people in our country who are marginalized and oppressed, and the inherent hindrances in the social system that erase diversity and personal identity."

Justice and Equity Facilitator: Josh Paterson

Canada's relationship with its First Nations and the country's treatment of newcomers are two of the most fraught issues in the country's history.

"Canada has a deeply problematic history in regards to indigenous rights, and the very sad reality is that these issues still persist," said Nisha Patel, a bachelor of commerce candidate at the University of Alberta and part of the Justice and Equity working group.

"Although I'm troubled by this, I was moved by how passionate my peers were, and I'm confident that we can change whatever we want."

Arts and Creativity Facilitator: Melissa Mongiat

As Canada's urban populations grow, culture, creativity and inclusivity are becoming critical in helping citizens connect and create healthy cities.

"What resonated with me the most was how we treat our indigenous people and cultures. I do a lot of work in the Innu communities in Labrador and consider myself pretty involved in the community, but there's still so much to learn," said Jamie Brace, a professional clown and performer from Kilbride in Newfoundland and Labrador.

Environment and Economy Facilitator: Jesika Briones

Countries around the world, including Canada, are going through an energy transition, said Jesika Briones, a business development manager for the Advanced Energy Centre in Toronto.

The world's population is growing explosively, availability of non-renewable energy resources is declining, and extraction and exploitation of these resources impacts the environment.

How can Canada and all of its stakeholders work to balance these factors and create a new energy economy?

Delegates looked at potential routes Canada could take in the next 50 years, including the use carbon taxes and the development of a national energy strategy.

Technology and Media Facilitator: Stephanie McGrath

Where is technology going and how can Canada stay ahead of the curve?

As content — video, text, photos and beyond — becomes available in even more formats and places than it is now, "we need to find a way to navigate the Internet," said Saskatchewanderer blogger Taylor.

One of the biggest challenges will be to create "better media literacy in schools, teaching kids from a young age to think critically about media," Taylor said.

Canada and the World Facilitator: Stéfanie von Hlatky

Current conflicts in Iraq, Syria and Ukraine indicate that our traditional approaches to diplomacy and defence aren't enough, said Stéfanie von Hlatky, director of the Centre for International and Defence Policy (CIDP) at Queen's University.

"As Canadians, we need to ask ourselves what we're willing to fight for in this volatile global security environment," said von Hlatky. "I think we've lost sight of that with the war fatigue that followed the mission in Afghanistan."

Delegates discussed alternative scenarios for Canadian involvement in international crises.

GSK, Canada's largest flu vaccine supplier, won't be able to fill about 30 per cent of its Canadian order for the upcoming 2014-15 flu season, the company said Thursday.

It also suggested the problems at its production facility in Ste. Foy, Que., may have an impact on its ability to supply vaccine to the U.S. market from that plant this season.

GlaxoSmithKline, which now goes by the name GSK, said problems in this year's production run have left it with a shortfall of about two million doses. The company was slated to provide nearly 6.4 million doses, 53 per cent of Canada's total purchase of about 12 million doses.

The Public Health Agency of Canada said it has secured 1.2 million additional doses of vaccine from other manufacturers which have a portion of the country's flu vaccine supply contract. Those companies are Sanofi Pasteur, Novartis and MedImmune, which is owned by AstraZeneca.

The Public Health Agency's statement, sent via email, suggested there may be delays in the delivery of the portion of the GSK contract that the company still believes it can fill.

"A new delivery schedule for the flu vaccine from GSK is still being determined but it is expected that deliveries will start in the second or third week of October, long before flu immunization demand reaches its peak," it said.

GSK said in an email that the production problem was unrelated to the concerns raised earlier this year in inspections by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and Health Canada.

The two-million-dose shortfall represents just under 17 per cent of Canada's total vaccine purchase for this year.

The news comes as provinces and territories are gearing up to start flu vaccination programs beginning next month.

Warning letter

FDA found a variety of problems

The FDA had issued a warning letter after it found a variety of problems in an inspection, stemming from bacterial contamination in the plant's water supply.

The company said it identified irregular results in its routine quality control monitoring on Aug. 14 and suspended production to investigate and try to fix the problem. Production was reinstated on Aug. 26 but it will result in a delivery delay, the company said.

It also said it had "an invalid test result" on one component of the vaccine, which protects against three different strains of influenza.

Canada leading push for 'flushable wipes' standard

Canada is leading an international work group to come up with an industry-wide standard for so-called flushable wipes as waste-water experts in North America and beyond blame the personal towelettes for a host of sewage system problems.

Barry Orr, a waste-water official in London, Ont., is among the Canadians leading the Geneva-based International Standards Organization's efforts to develop the standard.

Raw numbers

20,000

Last month, officials in the Minnesota town of Cambridge said they suspected personal wipes were the culprit after 20,000 gallons of raw sewage spilled into a river after a backup at a waste-water treatment facility.

Orr is currently developing tests that will determine the flushability of a barrage of products on the market that declare themselves sewer- and septic-safe.

"Canada is at the forefront in addressing the flushability of these products," Orr, who has been raising alarm bells about the products for years, said in a recent interview.

"We're leading the ISO, and we're working with nations across the globe to make improvements."

Flushable wipes are a multibillion-dollar business.

But from Louisiana to southwestern Ontario and rural England, plumbers and waste-water experts say the pre-moistened wipes, branded as a cleaner alternative to toilet paper, are taking a terrible toll on residential pipes and municipal sewage systems, causing major clogs and sewer backups. CRTC report

Less channel-surfing, more TV-watching

Canadians spent a little less time channel-surfing last year but still watched more TV content overall when accounting for streaming, suggests a report by the CRTC.

The average Canadian aged two or older watched 27.9 hours of TV a week in 2013 — or about four hours nightly — which was down by about 20 minutes from 2012, according to the 2014 Communications Monitoring Report. The average adult streamed 1.9 hours of TV content in 2013, which was up about 45 per cent over the previous year.

Over 40 per cent of Canadians said they watched TV over the Internet in 2013.

While many chose to cut the cord in 2013 and go without a TV subscription, they still made up a small minority.

Google to refund $19M for purchases made by children

Google has agreed to pay full refunds totalling at least $19 million to consumers who were charged for purchases that children made via apps, without parental consent, from the Google Play app store.

The settlement is part of the third case by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) about unauthorized in-app purchases made by children.

The FTC settled with Apple for $32.5 million in January and it has filed a complaint against Amazon.

In Google's case, the FTC said that since 2011, consumers have reported children making unauthorized purchases ranging from 99 cents to $200, within kids' apps downloaded from the Google Play store. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Ex-first lady depicts French president as cruel, dishonest

New book published. Valerie Trierweiler says Francois Hollande, of the Socialist Party, 'doesn't like the poor'

A woman walks past copies of Thank You for This Moment, by Valerie Trierweiler, in a Paris bookstore on Thursday.

JACQUES BRINON/THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Valerie Trierweiler, France's first lady until earlier this year, paints a harsh portrait of her former partner, the deeply unpopular President Francois Hollande, in her new book.

Being described as a mean liar who perpetuates a "cycle of infidelity" and doesn't like the poor surely can't help the image of the Socialist leader.

The couple broke up in January amid reports Hollande was having an affair with French actress Julie Gayet, which he did not deny.

In her 320-page book published Thursday, titled Thank You for This Moment, Trierweiler describes her relationship with Hollande in biting detail, from their first kiss to their breakup after the Gayet affair emerged.

Hollande's office declined to comment.

According to Trierweiler, the relationship was born of infidelity and died from it.

They almost tied the knot: Trierweiler wrote that he proposed in September 2012 and they planned a private wedding just before Christmas. With about a month to go, Hollande abruptly called off those plans, she wrote.

"Julie Gayet was already in his life, but I didn't know," wrote Trierweiler, a longtime journalist with Paris Match magazine.

When Trierweiler fell in love with Hollande, the mother of three was married, and he was the longtime partner of Segolene Royal, also a Socialist politician, and father of their four children. Hollande and Royal split in 2007, two years after his affair with Trierweiler began. Trierweiler lamented that she has been seen by many as the destroyer of the "mythic couple" of French politics.

Joan Rivers participates in the annual Sydney Gay and Lesbian Mardi Gras Parade on Oxford Street on March 7, 2009 in Sydney, Australia.

BRENDON THORNE/GETTY IMAGES FILE

Joan Rivers dead at 81

Got her start at local clubs in New York.
In 1965, she landed her big break on The Tonight Show

Joan Rivers, the raucous, acid-tongued comedian who crashed the male-dominated realm of late-night talk shows and turned Hollywood red carpets into danger zones for badly dressed celebrities, died Thursday. She was 81.

Rivers was hospitalized last week after she went into cardiac arrest at a Manhattan doctor's office following a routine procedure. Daughter Melissa Rivers said she died at Mount Sinai Hospital in New York, surrounded by family and close friends.

"My mother's greatest joy in life was to make people laugh," Melissa Rivers said. "Although that is difficult to do right now, I know her final wish would be that we return to laughing soon."

Rivers, who made "Can we talk?" a trademark of her routines, never mellowed during her half-century-long career. She had insults ready for all races, genders and creeds. She moved from longtime targets such as the weight problems of Elizabeth Taylor, of whom she said "her favourite food is seconds," to newer foes such as Miley Cyrus, and continued to appear on stage and on TV as an octogenarian.

Comedy was not only her calling but her therapy, as she turned her life inside out for laughs, mocking everything from her proclaimed lack of sex appeal ("My best birth control now is just to leave the lights on") to her own mortality.

"I have never wanted to be a day less than I am," she insisted in a 2013 interview with The Associated Press. "People say, 'I wish I were 30 again.' Nahhh! I'm very happy HERE. It's great. It gets better and better. And then, of course, we die," she quipped.

Coffee plants mutated to have caffeine: Study

Scientists have woken up and smelled the coffee — and analyzed its DNA.

They found that what we love about coffee — the caffeine — is a genetic quirk, not related to the caffeine in chocolate or tea.

"It's an accident that has been frozen in place very likely by the influence of natural selection," says University of Buffalo evolutionary biologist Victor Albert. He and more than 60 other researchers from around the world mapped out the genetic instruction book of java. Their results were published Thursday in the journal Science.

Albert says researchers discovered that caffeine developed separately in coffee, tea and chocolate.

Facebook, which has more than 19 million users in Canada, will first target users who log in with a desktop or laptop computer.

Survivors' blood may be key to new Ebola therapy

Outbreak. Unproven therapy would use antibodies from survivors to combat the often-deadly virus

As West Africa struggles to contain the biggest Ebola outbreak ever, some experts say an unusual but simple treatment might help: the blood of survivors.

The evidence is mixed for using infection-fighting antibodies from survivors' blood for Ebola treatment, but some say it's worth a shot, considering there are so few licensed or tested drugs.

"This is something that's fairly simple to do," said Dr. Peter Piot, director of London's School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine and the co-discoverer of the Ebola virus.

Using survivors' blood is just one novel Ebola treatment under discussion at a two-day meeting that began Thursday in Geneva.

More than 200 experts were assembled by the World Health Organization to look at issues of safety and effectiveness, while considering which treatments should be prioritized for testing.

There are about a half-dozen medications and vaccines in development. None have been rigorously tested in humans, but testing of one vaccine began this week in the U.S.

Some scientists think antibodies in the blood of Ebola survivors could help patients infected with the deadly disease.

Piot said it is vital to find out if the blood treatment is effective.

"I hope this is the last Ebola outbreak where all we have is isolation, quarantine and supportive care to treat patients," he said.

$17.6B in fines possible

BP acted with 'gross negligence' in 2010 oil spill

A judge's ruling in the 2010 Gulf of Mexico oil spill case that could cost BP an additional $17.6 billion US in fines sent the company's shares tumbling Thursday.

BP was found by U.S. District Judge Carl Barbier to have acted with "gross negligence," leading to the worst U.S. offshore oil spill. The ruling triggers the highest possible fines under the Clean Air Act of $4,300 per barrel of oil spilled.

The number of barrels spilled is being debated but is likely to fall between 2.4 million and 4.1 million barrels. That translates to a fine of between $10.3 billion and $17.6 billion.

While BP has already spent at least $24 billion in spill-related expenses to date, including cleanup costs and payments to affected businesses and residents, it had set aside just $3.5 billion to cover what it thought would be a much smaller fine for actually spilling the oil.

BP shares fell $2.82, or 5.9 per cent, to $44.89, reducing the company's market value by $8.66 billion. The shares were near $60 per share just prior to the April 2010 spill.

Bruce Huber, associate professor of law at the University of Notre Dame, who specializes in environmental, natural resources and energy law, said investors had already assumed BP would pay a bigger fine than the company hoped it would face.

That protected BP's shares from falling even further, Huber said.

The fight to supersize McJob wages rages on

Can I get a raise with that? The movement continues to pressure fast-food giants into increasing employee wages to $15 an hour

Police handcuffed several protesters in New York and Detroit on Thursday as they blocked traffic in the latest attempt to escalate their efforts to get McDonald's, Burger King and other fast-food companies to pay their employees at least $15 US an hour.

The protests, which are planned by labour organizers for about 150 cities nationwide throughout Thursday, are part of the "Fight for $15" campaign. Since the protests began in late 2012, organizers have switched up their tactics every few months.

Before Thursday's protests, organizers said they planned to engage in nonviolent civil disobedience to draw more attention to the cause. In the past, supporters have showed up at a McDonald's shareholder meeting and held strikes. The idea of civil disobedience arose in July when 1,300 workers held a convention in Chicago.

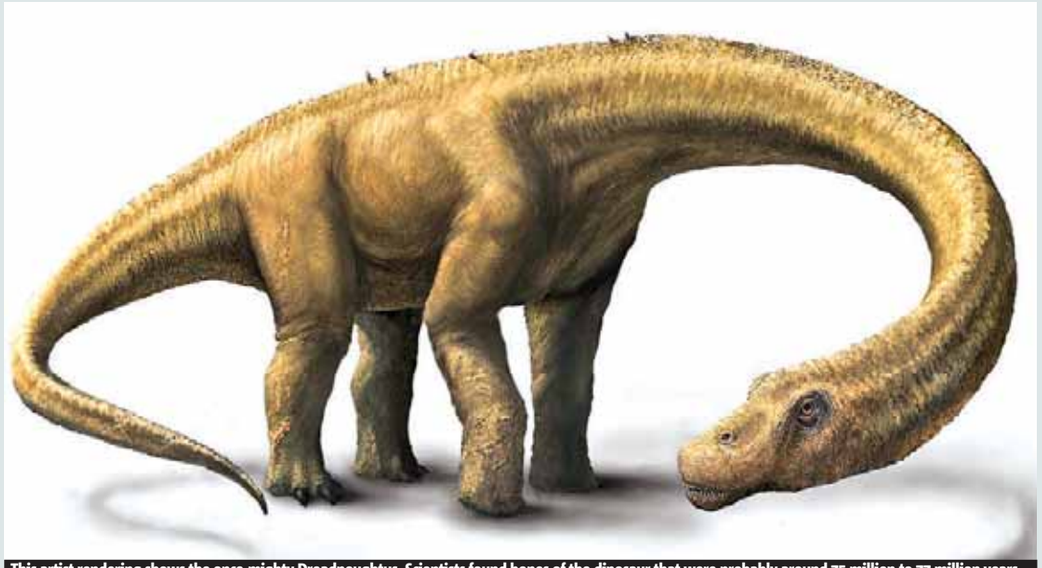
Dreadnoughtus ("fearing nothing")



This artist rendering shows the once-mighty Dreadnoughtus. Scientists found bones of the dinosaur that were probably around 75 million to 77 million years old. MARK A. KLINGLER/CARNEGIE MUSEUM OF NATURAL HISTORY/THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Massive dino from Argentina should help reveal secrets of ancient behemoths

Researchers studying the remains of an enormous dinosaur — a creature that was bigger than seven bull elephants — have given it an equally colossal name: Dreadnoughtus, or "fearing nothing."

Scientists hope its unusually well-preserved bones will help reveal secrets about some of the largest animals ever to walk the Earth. The four-legged beast, with a long neck and powerful 8.8-metre tail, stretched about 25.9 metres long and weighed about 65 tonnes. That's more than seven times the weight of even a plus-size male African elephant.

Kenneth Lacovara of Drexel University in Philadelphia, who found the specimen in Argentina's southern Patagonia in 2005, said he can't claim it is the most massive dinosaur known because the remains of comparably sized beasts are too fragmentary to allow a direct comparison.

But it's the heaviest land animal whose weight during life can be calculated directly with a standard technique that analyzes bones of the upper limbs, he said. And its bones indicate it was still growing when it died.

Among the questions it can help scientists investigate, said Jeff Wilson of the University of Michigan, is what kind of anatomical features were needed to let a dinosaur grow so huge. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

‘No bad Bill Murray movies’

Reel Guys

RICHARD CROUSE AND MARK BRESLIN

Bill Murray in his latest film, St. Vincent. Sept. 5 is Bill Murray Day at TIFF, with free screenings planned for some of his most iconic films, including Groundhog Day, Stripes and, of course, Ghostbusters. CONTRIBUTED

Synopsis

On Sept. 5, the Reel Guys will be wearing our matching glow-in-the-dark Dr. Venkman khaki T-shirts to celebrate TIFF’s Bill Murray Day. Beginning at 10 a.m., the TIFF Bell Lightbox in Toronto will feature free screenings of Stripes, Groundhog Day and, everybody’s favourite, Ghostbusters, in advance of the world premier of Murray’s new movie St. Vincent. “I’m a nut,” Murray says, “but not just a nut.” His movies, which range from nutty comedies to dramas and everything in between, show his range. Today, as we celebrate the genius that is Bill Murray, the Reel Guys select a few must-sees.

Bill Murray Day. Think you’re a big Bill Murray fan? Check out these lesser-known films and roles for a glimpse into the depth of his talent

Richard: Mark, I feel happy just knowing that I live in the same world as Bill Murray. I’ve never met him, but his very existence and the existence of films like Meatballs, Ghostbusters, Lost in Translation and any of his movies with Wes Anderson make my world a better place.

If I had to choose one little-seen Murray movie to tout, it would be Where the Buffalo Roam — his take on the life of the high priest of Gonzo journalism, Hunter S. Thompson. It’s not a great film, but it’s worth it to hear Murray say the famous line, “I hate to advocate drugs or liquor, violence, insanity to anyone, but, in my case, it worked.”

Mark: Richard, here’s my pick for a little-known film starring Murray: The Razor’s Edge. At the height of Murray’s first round of fame, he managed to miscast himself in a Somerset Maugham costume drama about a man’s search for spirituality.

His acting style is completely at odds with the rest of the material, as he’s playing the part as a louche 19th-century wiseass. And you know what? I love it!

Also from this time period, the mid-’80s, is the underrated Scrooged, a great retelling of A Christmas Carol. Traditionalists who fondly remember Alistair Sims would be aghast, but Murray really knows how to shake off the cobwebs and make the movie funny and oddly touching.

RC: Have you seen Murray in Hyde Park on Hudson? He plays Franklin D. Roosevelt and he gives the kind of effortless performance that made me wonder what might have happened to his career if The Razor’s Edge hadn’t been such a flop, forcing him back into comedy. But he can switch back and forth easily.

The same year he played an undertaker in Get Low, he also played an exaggerated version of himself as a man who plays at being a zombie during the apocalypse so he can continue playing golf unbothered by the undead in Zombieland.

It’s a surreal cameo that, like most of Murray’s appearances, is worth the price of admission.

MB: There may be bad movies that Bill Murray is in but there are no bad Bill Murray movies. He consistently rises above the material. But when the script is top-notch, there is no beating him.

I’m thinking here of Groundhog Day — one of the best and smartest comedies of the past 30 years.

He takes a clever idea and turns it into something transcendent, even philosophical. Great movie, great performance.

RC: In the transcendent and philosophical pile, I’d throw in Broken Flowers, where Murray plays a man on a journey to reconnect with all the women he knew before he became a burned-out Don Juan.

Ebert gave this four out of four stars; I give it five out of four. It’s that good.

MB: Yes, a great role for him. But consider this: his supporting role in Tootsie, where he nearly steals scenes from the great Dustin Hoffman.

Diving into Dolphin Tale 2

Sequel. Teen stars Nathan Gamble and Cozi Zuehlsdorff reunite for another silver screen splash

"All I did was teach you not to cover her blowhole," he says.

"I wouldn't have known that," she laughs.

No, that's not the punchline to a bad joke, it's part of the easy banter between Dolphin Tale 2's teen stars Nathan Gamble and Cozi Zuehlsdorff.

They were preteens when they first worked together on Dolphin Tale, the story of Winter, an injured dolphin rescued by the Clearwater Marine Hospital and fitted with a prosthetic tail.

"My character didn't really get to go underwater in the first one," says Cozi, "so it was all, almost, a new experience. Winter and Nathan were the veterans and they taught me and Hope (the second movie's dolphin star) the ropes."

Like not covering the blowhole.

Dolphin Tale 2 is a continuation of Winter's tale. This time around Sawyer and Hazel and the Clearwater Marine Hospital folks search for a companion for the lonely dolphin. "Think about it," says Nathan, "has there ever been a sequel to a true story? And one that is also true? It's pretty rare."

The second movie's story was inspired by a true event that happened during the wrap party for the first film.

"That's when we got the call that Hope was rescued," says Nathan.

"We were there and so it feels like we were a little bit part of the story."

"The truck pulled up and Hope was really carried by hand up to the pool," says Cozi, "and really lowered into the pool the way you see in the movie. It was incredible. (Dolphin Tale 2) is as true-to-life as you could get without saying it was a wrap party for a movie. That wouldn't have fit into the story."

What does fit into the movie is Nathan's relationship with Winter, a bond formed years ago.

"There was this one moment on the second one where we were just hanging out," he says.

"I did this thing where I tilted my head and said, 'Hey Winter, how's it going?' She bubbled at the surface and sank to the bottom. Her trainer said, 'That's really bizarre,' and then remembered that was one of the behaviours I gave her on the first film and they haven't done that since the first film. That means she remembers me doing it three years ago, which is really bizarre."

How do we see Gump 20 years later?

MATT PRIGGE
Metro World News in New York

In 1994, the movies belonged to Forrest Gump. It was the year's highest-grossing film, narrowly besting The Lion King, and was at one point the fourth biggest money-maker in film history. It took home six of the 11 Oscars for which it was nominated, including best picture and best actor — Tom Hanks' second consecutive win after Philadelphia. Its soundtrack, littered with recycled hits from the '60s and '70s, was a hit too, and the 1986 source novel, by Winston Groom, became a bestseller.

But 20 years is a long time, and one era's monster hit is another's "dated" (that awful word) embarrassment. Now that it's being rereleased in theatres, in a probably unnecessary IMAX redo, here are a few ways to look at Gump two decades down the line.

As the victim of a backlash

Anything that has the cultural impact Forrest Gump did will attract a backlash. The one it got came harsh and fast. By the time the Oscars rolled around in March of 1995, there were two kinds of Americans: those who embraced Gump, with its idyllic view of America during troubled times, and those who were crazy for Pulp Fiction, the darker, more original bad boy movie of the year. Quentin Tarantino's juggernaut wound up having a larger impact on movies and the zeitgeist, creating careers and wave upon wave of imitators. Gump is still beloved; 14th place on the all-time list of popular movies by the Internet Movie Database users (ahead of One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, behind Inception) is nothing to sneeze at. But ranking higher are two other 1994 titles: Pulp Fiction (No. 5) and The Shawshank Redemption (No. 1). Gump was a critic's hit upon release, too, but retrospective reviews have been less kind. Indeed, it's become a critical punching bag among the cognoscenti — the film one holds up as the populist hit that quickly turned mouldy and insufferable.

Forrest Gump is being re-released in select IMAX theatres this weekend. CONTRIBUTED

As a conservative beacon

In Groom's novel, Gump is a rougher character: He swears, he has sex and he even, briefly, becomes a folk singer along with BFF Jenny. Eric Roth's screenplay sands Gump down; he becomes the embodiment of all that is decent about America, who chooses to fight for his country while Jenny embraces hedonistic hippiedom and pays a price.

The counterculture is depicted as evil; the SDS guy beats women and the Black Panthers are portrayed as scary black men. It's easy to read Gump as portraying that conservative canard about the failure of the hippies to impact the change they sought (though it skips the part where some of them turn into mega-capitalists in the '80s). For the record, Gump's producers claim it's apolitical, while its reliably liberal star likely disagrees with this reading as well.

As a bastardization of a novel

There are a lot of changes from Groom's novel, some already detailed. But the most dramatic is the physical change. In the book, Gump is six feet six inches 242 pounds; Groom imagined John Goodman for the role. Tom Hanks, meanwhile, is a lean six feet, and though his Gump plays football, just like his literary counterpart, it's because he can run, not because he can sack players. The book Gump is also an idiot savant, not just an idiot, who can read books (if not remember them well) and who becomes a chess champion.

Mariah begins divorce process, Nick declares his undying love

NED EHRBAR

Mariah Carey and Nick Cannon appear to be approaching this whole breakup thing very differently. While Cannon is said to be eager for another chance, Carey seems to be ready to make the split official.

"Mariah has started the divorce process. She's getting all her ducks in a row," a source tells E! News. "She was devastated when he spoke out about their issues. She's started the proceedings to make sure the ball is in her court from now on."

Meanwhile, Cannon — who is reportedly banned from discussing the divorce publicly — has taken to tweeting about his marriage and his undying love for Carey.

"What infuriates me most is to hear people slander Mariah Carey. I will forever be indebted to her for blessing me with our children," he tweeted. "I will always love her unconditionally for this and so much more. Mariah Carey is an amazing mother and I trust her wholeheartedly."

He also has an interesting take on the gossip item that started the ball rolling: "And finally, 'trouble in paradise' is the dumbest phrase I've ever heard! I would never say that s—."

Nude photos of Lawrence added to life-sized gallery

Wonder how Jennifer Lawrence's lawyers are going to deal with this one: Fear Google artist XVALA has announced the recent collection of leaked celebrity nude photos will be added to his upcoming No Delete gallery show in St. Petersburg, Fla. — printed out life-sized on canvas.

"XVALA appropriating celebrity compromised images and the overall Fear Google campaign has helped strengthen the ongoing debate over privacy in the digital era," the artist's publicist, Cory Allen, says in a statement.

"The commentary behind this show is a reflection of who we are today. We all become 'users' and in the end, we become 'used.'"

Beef Noodles. Making your own version of this typically pre-packaged dish is easy and takes no time

Because everyone gets even busier in the fall, it's the perfect time to get organized and add some quick-and-easy meals to your roster of go-to recipes.

If you're used to reaching for boxed noodles in a culinary emergency, it's time to upgrade to the DIY version.

1. In a large pot of salted boiling water, cook the noodles al dente. Drain and drizzle with a little olive oil to prevent them from sticking together. Set aside.

2. In a large non-stick skillet over medium heat, cook the onion in the butter, stirring with a wooden spoon until golden brown. Add the meat and garlic. Continue cooking over high heat, crumbling the meat into small pieces with a spoon, until lightly browned. Season with salt and pepper. Sprinkle the flour and chili powder over the meat and stir to blend.

This recipe serves four. COURTESY RICARDOCUISINE.COM

Ingredients

- 1/2 lb (227 g) broad egg noodles (twisted)

FLASH FOOD

Liquid Assets

Satisfy your sweet tooth

LIQUID ASSETS

If you thought the popularity of sweeter red wines was starting to decline, drink again.

Demand for red juice with a touch (and in some cases a fistful) of sugar has never been stronger.

While snobs may turn up their noses, the growing selection of wines with a confectionary slant is appealing to new consumers who would traditionally fill their glasses with beer or a cocktail.

One of the latest countries trying to satisfy the market's sweet tooth is South Africa. Though it's made casual sipping reds with the pinotage grape for years, the 2011 Inception Deep Layered Red ($13.49 - $15.99) is a juicy shiraz-based blend.

Launched here in Canada before anywhere else, its sugary side — enhanced with a nice balance of ripe blueberry, blackberry and cherry fruit — isn't syrupy or cloying.

It's a party pleaser, especially if you're hosting a late summer barbecue.

Its flavour will get your guests' tongues wagging, as should its provocative Garden of Eden label design. PRICES REFLECT THE RANGE ACROSS THE COUNTRY. SOME PRODUCTS MAY NOT BE AVAILABLE IN ALL PROVINCES.

As a special end-of-summer gift to our readers, Metro brings you the first chapter of The Afterlife of Stars, the newest book by award-winning author Joseph Kertes. Over the last week we've introduced you to the Beck brothers, two young boys grappling with the world around them as Russian tanks roll into Budapest during the final days of the Hungarian revolution. In this final instalment, Attila and Robert get a glimpse of the dangers that are around every street corner as their world is turned upside down.

The Afterlife of Stars

Will this be the last time the Beck brothers see their city? CONTRIBUTED

I felt a little strange, but I could hardly wait to see the square again. It had been some time since I'd been there. I had come with my class on a clear day last spring. Stalin had stood like a Titan in the square on a high stone pedestal, a bronze man more impressive than a building. (If you want to make someone look like the Lord himself, my advice would be to make him Big, his right arm raised high, his hand upturned, focusing the blue lens of heaven.)

When Attila and I turned the corner from Andrassy Avenue onto Dozsa Way, at first I thought we'd come to the wrong square. On Stalin's pedestal stood two boots the size of boilers, but no Papa.

"There!" Attila said, clapping his hands and hooting. We ran like mad toward the pedestal. Attila hooted again and jumped.

Stalin lay toppled behind his high stone bastion. He was entangled in ropes and chains, like a colossus hoisted from the sea. But his big bronze boots still stood. Rope ladders hung from them.

There were few other people in the square, surprisingly few, but they covered their open mouths when they saw what we saw and scrambled away, as if the fallen god's dark angels were still hovering, were about to take revenge.

But Attila was fearless. He pulled me along like a dog toward the fallen father.

A shot rang out, dinging something. I checked the windows all around the square, the trees, the moving shadows. A good breeze blew through the trees. Another shot pocked the pedestal.

My brother's tone sharpened. "Come!" he said. "Hurry." He was several rungs up one of the rope ladders. "Come!" he barked again.

I followed him. We scrambled up the sagging ladders. Who could have invented such a thing? I banged my elbow on the stone, scraped the knuckles of my left hand.

Attila was already on top. Several Russian soldiers came running toward their bronze leader from the other side.

Attila helped me reach the top of the pedestal. "We have to get inside."

"Inside what?"

"The boots. One each. There's a ladder up the far side of that one. You take that. I can get up this chain."

"We're going inside the boots?"

Attila was hoisting himself up the chain, deftly coordinating his hands and feet like a monkey.

I began to clamber up the second ladder. "What are we doing?" I grunted.

"We'll be like Mother Goose. We'll be the Brothers Goose."

Attila waited and watched me. Once I made it to the lip of the boot, I was surprised to see how cavernous it was inside, taller than I was. My brother gestured to me to raise the rope ladder — hoist it up with all my might — and let it fall inside the boot. I watched him do it first with his chain, then I did mine. The ladder was surprisingly bony and heavy. I stupidly avoided the ladder on the inside and instead slithered down into the boot, though I was not the best slitherer, and took quite a fall to the bottom, landing against my shoulder. I'd heard my brother sensibly drop feet first in his.

What now? I was quaking, suddenly taken with a chill, my teeth chattering. I looked up into Stalin's blue heaven. I was overcome with dread that we would soon become the Brothers Corpse, that it would have been a more glorious death to have been strung up in the Oktogon, that if we were to come out of this alive, my father would beat us, as he must.

I wondered suddenly where Stalin's bronze socks might have gotten to before I came to a conclusion I was not proud of: it was that Stalin had no actual feet, at least not this Stalin.

The inside of the boot darkened for a moment, and I distinctly remember thinking what a good idea clouds were, not to mention rain. I wondered if clouds had been an aesthetic choice or a practical one. And what about rain? My brother always questioned whether things had been created or had evolved, but I didn't care quite as much about that. For me, at the time, the difference was only a matter of gradual development versus sudden appearance. Though I struggled with such generalities, I was less concerned about them then and more interested in the mere fact of them. What, I wondered, must it have been like to be the first person to experience rain? What are these? There's a heavenly river and it is breaking up. These are shattered shards of river. Bits of river. Bits of lake. Lake beads. River beads. What is going on? Am I going to shrink or expand or drink or drown?

A shot clanged against my boot or Attila's. My teeth clattered like mad, like something loose inside me, a box of buttons.

Then just as suddenly a calm settled over me like a gossamer net. I recall with great clarity that very moment inside the boot. Was this the end? Would they find us in these boots? Would Attila jump out like the warrior rebel he was and take the bullet he was born to take? Would the Hungarians come to finish Stalin and complete their triumph? Would the Russians come first and fill the boots with concrete instead, monuments to Stalin's stalwartness? If they found my brother and me, would they make examples of us, chain us to the boots until the vultures came to peck out our eyes? Was there honor in that? And what was the protocol, the order, of killings? Soldiers first? Then civilians? Men first? Then the elderly? Then women? Finally children? And what was the cutoff mark? Was my brother still considered a child?

The soldier of the Oktogon dangled before my eyes like a clear statement, and I knew that Attila and I would not die like legends but like jokes, the Brothers Grimm without a tale, our family shaking their heads, not allowing our names to be uttered again.

I could not hear Attila in his boot. I wanted to call out to him but felt it best to stay quiet. I edged my way into the dark front of the boot, to where Stalin's toes would have been, and then I heard Attila loudly whisper my name. I crawled out from the toe, and he was there at the top of my boot. He must have pulled himself up. "Let's go, my tender love," he said. "It's all clear."

"How do you know?"

"Look at me. I'm not being shot at." He climbed down into my boot and hoisted me onto the rope ladder, urging me up before climbing out himself.

We flew down Damjanich Street and almost ran into a tank clattering to the right of us. I now saw that these beasts bruising around the streets were not meant to be stealthy or subtle. They were not even vehicles, more like instant buildings plopped down in the middle of the street, daring you to pass.

A squad of young men and a single young woman, a brunette with a determined look on her pretty, red face, turned a corner and came toward us. They were chanting, "Szabadsag! Szabadsag!" — Liberty! Liberty! — and waving a Hungarian flag with its familiar bars of red, white and green, but with the Communist insignia at its center cut out of it, leaving a hole.

More shots were fired from somewhere, clipping the stone face of a building. The squad of young people scattered. My brother grabbed me by the shoulder and yanked me into a doorway guarded by two stone lions. They stood on their hind legs, holding up the entrance, seeming to hold up the whole building. Sometimes it was angels who watched over an entrance; sometimes shapely stone maidens. But these were lions. It must have been a very heavy building. Stone lions will do things for you that real ones won't.

We waited several minutes, waited for quiet, before tiptoeing out. Attila and I veered swiftly to the left until we got out to Rakoczi Street. I could not catch my breath — I didn't even want to try. I could breathe later, I told myself. I found myself hoping we might see our parents again, and Klari, and my friend Zoli, possibly. Up ahead, a man stood calmly outside the Urania Movie Theater. He was dressed in a brown gabardine suit and wore a matching brown fedora. He was lighting a cigarette, turning away from the wind that brought us. The Urania was white and had Moorish windows. It always beckoned like a foreign land, like an exotic Arabian bazaar laden with wild and exquisite gifts, gifts with horns and warm gems.

We caught up to the man just as he exhaled his first full puff of smoke, just as a shot sounded, taking off his hat. For a stark and childish moment, the Baby Diviner growing inside of me traced the path of the bullet through the man's head as it knocked over everything in its path: his day, his night, his next puff of smoke, his dinner plate of veal paprikas, his smiling daughter holding up a glass to the light to see if it was cracked, his wife entering the dining room with the wine, wiping a damp hand on her apron.

The bullet might as well have struck us too, my brother and me. "Let's go!" Attila snapped. He pulled me straight through the doors of the Urania Theater, the white doors splattered now with blood.

An unsuspecting young woman, no bigger than a fawn, sat in her ticket booth. She smiled at us.

I was gasping, panting. "A man has been shot," I said.

"A man?" She rose with a creak from her chair to look out, raised her hand to her heart to protect it. "Oh," she said. The hand went to her mouth. She started to cry, but silently, sobbing, hiccupping.

"This way," Attila said.

"What?" she said. She was still looking outside. She could see blood on the glass.

"Now!" snapped my brother. "Now," he repeated, more gently. He was pointing into the theater, the promised darkness.

My teeth were clattering like a box of nails now, not buttons. The fawn girl's white skin had turned blotchy, suffused with fright, her eyes wide and a crazed white. To escape the hunter, the fawn pattered to the front of the theater near the screen and straight out a side door. I thought we were going to follow, but my brother pulled me down low into the seat beside him.

There, in the darkness, Tarzan unleashed a sound like a jungle aria. The Urania was showing Tarzan the Ape Man. The theater was majestic with its tall Arabian arches. A young couple sitting in a private box above us ignored Tarzan and Jane. They were making a meal out of each other's ears and lips. Would their love wither when they found the fallen man outside? Would Tarzan have helped the man in the brown suit?

Attila stared at the screen.

So that was the plan? We were going to sit now and watch a movie? We ran away from home, we hid in Stalin's boots, we saw a man shot, and now we were going to watch Tarzan the Ape Man? We saw a real man's head explode, but now we'd watch Johnny Weissmuller swing through the trees? There was an absoluteness to events as Attila experienced them. It is sleep time, and now I will sleep. It is eating time, and now I will eat. It is ducking into a theater time, and now I will duck. Once in the theater, I will watch a movie, which is what we do in a theater.

I could not draw a single satisfying breath. Tarzan fought a lion. Jane was pretty. Tarzan swam with crocodiles. Jane loved Tarzan. Tarzan trumpeted through the jungle. Cheetah cringed. But where was Kaiser Laszlo? Where was the man in the brown hat? Who would carry him away? What time was it? Had the Russians expelled our parents? Did our parents think we were dead?

"I'm going," I said, and got to my feet. Attila couldn't take his eyes off the screen. "I'm going," I said again, and began to march to the front of the theater, where the fawn had disappeared.

Attila slapped at the armrest but followed. I took a last look up at the solitary couple in the box, but they had no interest in anyone else, in the world beyond their faces. Attila heaved open the side door with his bum. The sun's yellow smack blinded us, but we ran through it toward home. A cool wind blew up from the Danube flecked with dust and leaves, but soon enough we could make out the familiar landmarks of our neighborhood and let down our guard a little. It was not until then that I finally found the meat of the air and took in a good gulp of it.

I stopped for a moment. "Why did they shoot the man with the brown hat, Attila?"

"I don't know," my brother said. He took my hand.

"What was the man doing?"

"He was lighting a smoke."

"And he got shot for that?"

I stopped, but Attila pulled us along. "Not for that," he said. "For stopping where he did, for being a standing target, for sport."

We got home just ahead of the Russians, who were late. When we slipped through the door, we were met by our father. I'd never seen him in such a fury. He was a snorting bull. He lifted Attila by the collar of his shirt, a mighty act, since my brother was almost full grown.

"You Russian!" Attila shouted at him.

Simon banged Attila up against the wall. But the matadors swooped down on them: my father's cousin Andras, his wife, Judit, our grandmother and mother. My father let Attila down but raised his fist at both of us like a biblical figure.

Our mother slipped between the raised fist and my brother's golden head.

"Don't hit them!" Judit said. She embraced her own swollen abdomen. She gasped and looked ready to faint. "Oh," she said to her belly. She staggered back into the living room with the help of her husband.

Lili, our mother, hugged and kissed my brother and me strenuously, squeezing too hard. "My lambs, my lambkins," she said.

Klari stood behind her. She looked especially disappointed, disappointment to equal my father's fury, as if her faith in life had been shaken, her faith in love.

Just as she hugged me hard too, Attila broke free, bellowed like Tarzan, pounded his chest and flew off to our room. I lost my breath again. My heart took off without a runner. The dead man in brown rose up in front of me, and I started to sob and shake. My grandmother sobbed with me, then my mother too, the three of us swaying together and sobbing.

My father snorted and slapped at his sides. "We have to go."

"Simon," my mother said through her tears, "we have our sons back."

"Great," he said. He slapped at his sides again. "We have to go. Now!"

We went to get our few things. Upon returning to the vestibule, we could hear Judit in the living room with Andras. "Are we just going to get on the train, just like that?"

"That's what we're going to do," said Andras. "Don't worry, dear, please."

"And the Russians will let us?"

"They're distracted just now, but not for long. They'll send in reinforcements, and when they do, we'll be stuck here. Our baby will be born here and grow up here."

"Is that so bad?" Judit whispered. "We grew up here."

"It will be bad, worse than we have known."

A short while later, Andras and Judit joined us in the hall. We were all leaving together, Andras and Judit included. They had brought their bags to our apartment, as well as a rolled-up carpet, a very old Persian one featuring a bird of paradise, which they treasured.

Minutes later, the Russians came, not a friendly group like the first one, and they pointed the way outward, out of our home.

Unlearning the game

Scoreless. Shut out in three games, the 'Caps sit out of playoff reach in an incredible swoon

CAM TUCKER
cam.tucker@metronews.ca

Kekuta Manneh of the Whitecaps carries the ball up field in this file photo. Manneh says he can't recall a worse streak in any of his previous clubs as the one the 'Caps are going through right now. JEFF VINNICK/GETTY IMAGES

When questioned, Kekuta Manneh couldn't recall a time when he or a club where he's played has gone through a slump like the one in which the Vancouver Whitecaps are mired.

The Whitecaps have been shut out in three straight games. They've recorded one of a possible nine points in that span. They've scored in only two of the last six games. They have only two wins since the start of July and have since slipped into sixth in the Western Conference, one point out of the final Western Conference playoff spot, currently occupied by rival Portland.

That sums it up on a team level.

On an individual scale, the 19-year-old speedy and shifty Manneh hasn't scored an MLS regular season goal since May 3.

"It's been a learning experience for me as well and most of the guys on the team too," he said Thursday.

"We've got to stay together as a team and as a family and try to figure out a way to break that."

Since this summer swoon began following the World Cup break, more and more questions are being asked about the local club's group of young forwards, also including the likes of Darren Mattocks and Erik Hurtado.

The formations coach Carl Robinson uses, often a 4-2-3-1 with one lone man up front, lately have been called into question.

While Robinson and president Bob Lenarduzzi have hinted at change in formation, and how different players are used, the club's next match against D.C. United at BC Place on Saturday is a test of mettle.

Can these young players shake off their slumps and struggles in yet another important match on home turf?

"I think we play better against the better teams in the league, so (it's) a good chance for us to show that we're ready to bounce back," said goalkeeper David Ousted.

NFL. Seahawks dominate Packers in season opener

Marshawn Lynch rushed for 110 yards and two touchdowns, Russell Wilson threw a pair of touchdown passes and the Seattle Seahawks started defence of their Super Bowl title with a 36-16 win over the Green Bay Packers on Thursday night.

Lynch, who ran for 1,257 yards and 12 touchdowns last season, barrelled through a trio of Packers for the TD with 3:41 left before halftime to give the Seahawks a 17-10 lead. He added a 3-yard TD run on the first play of the fourth quarter for a 29-10 advantage.

Wilson made sure everyone knew Percy Harvin was healthy, finding the speedy receiver seven times.

Aaron Rodgers threw for 189 yards and a touchdown, but the Packers' up-tempo offence was stymied by Seattle.

Chiquita Classic

Abbotsford golfers top-five after first round

Not one but two Abbotsford golfers are in contention following their respective first rounds at the Web.com Tour's Chiquita Classic in North Carolina on Thursday.

Adam Hadwin jumped out to the early lead after firing a 9-under par 63, two shots better than American John Peterson before play was suspended later in the afternoon due to inclement weather.

Hadwin, who has six top 10 finishes this year on the Web.com Tour, reeled off six consecutive birdies to the back nine to move to the top of the leader board.

Hadwin has already locked up a PGA Tour card for next season, finishing fourth on the Web.com Tour money list with more than $293,000 accrued in what was a bounce-back 2014 campaign for the charismatic golfer.

Taylor finished his opening round with a 5-under par 67 to jump into an early tie for fourth.

After a slow start to the year, and missing the cut in six consecutive tournaments through May and June, Taylor recorded a pair of top 10 finishes last month.

Taylor is still in contention for a PGA Tour card for 2015. At the conclusion of the Web.com Tour Finals, the feeder circuit will give out an additional 25 PGA Tour cards based on money earned in the final four tournaments.

Taylor sits 18th on the post-season money list heading into this weekend's event.
